Memo to the NRA

if I tell you I need an assault rifle to explode watermelons    would I be sane or would I be one more whack job who should be locked up    brandish that Second Amendment but guns do kill    people walking down the street people in a corner store    school children if I'd had a pistol when I found a burglar ten feet from where my children slept    I would have tried to kill him    but he    young and scared might have taken both it    and me

Memo to the Little Girl in a Tutu and Froggy Rain Boots

no curl in the middle of your forehead   just a need to stomp one foot   and a voice that projects don't tell me you stepped in dog shit   and that's why you're in frog boots on a day with no rain indeed   an individualist already   baby woman and clear-sighted as my granddaughter who in Disneyland   didn't dress like a princess   but as Minnie Mouse   stiff blunt-toed shoes and all

Memo to the Woman Who Thinks You Can't Be Too Rich or Too Thin

the coda you added to rich and thin was white blouses one could never have too many   you said the daughter who tried to starve herself into submission changed my mind about thin   and old ladies   I've noticed come either too thin or too fat   one a-penny two a-penny money its own story   coins for the ferryman may be required but happy has no price tag   and thin is better for watches or pancakes   though you may be right about white blouses

About the Memo Poems

In the far, far distant TV past, NBC's The Tonight Show was hosted by Steve Allen, who would often read newspaper letters to the editor aloud, insisting that the letters should be read with the tone of voice in which they were written.

The three poems here will appear in a chapbook called Memos, forthcoming from Omnidawn in 2015. They represent unsent letters to a variety of persons and organizations as well as to myself, houseplants, and the cat who brings me dead birds. The memo poems are also meant to be read with the tone of voice in which they were written: some angry, some tender, some thoughtful, some amusing.

The 39 poems that will appear in Memos represent only about two-thirds of the ones I wrote. The less strong pieces, as well as some of the angriest, have been omitted, including "Memo to the Teacher Who's Spent Too Much Time with Undergraduates" and "Memo to the Woman Who Stole My Mother's Snake Ring and Watch." Sometimes a rant is just a rant and isn't a poem.

"Memo to the Little Girl in a Tutu and Froggy Rain Boots" was one of the earliest, written after I saw a child dressed this way on a very warm, sunny day. The child's father told me she had stepped in dog poop and had no other shoes to wear. In my piece, of course, the girl has no excuse to wear the boots and tutu except the force of her baby woman will. "Memo to the Woman Who Thinks You Can't Be Too Rich or Too Thin" was another early one—a combination of the statements of a friend and my personal reaction to them.

"Memo to the NRA" was written in 2013 and is one of the last. All the 2013 poems are political in nature. Why? Because I am currently obsessed with issues of guns and climate change and strip mining and natural disaster.

Each memo poem is twelve lines or less. Each has four spaces in place of punctuation, because I believe memos are mostly written unpunctuated. Also, because I am a person who loves punctuation, this was a test for myself—to see if I could, without punctuation, create the kind of pauses I felt necessary for these pieces.

some smart people always manage to publish work that seems fresh and surprising how lucky the writers who find here acceptance and a home
