

Karen Schubert: Poem [1]

October 1, 2013 Featured Poetry [2]

Summer of the Blue Cast

Lee broke his arm in the north woods of Wisconsin. Copper Falls.
I was circling back
to our campsite with my toothbrush, lingering on the path
lit with fireflies, sounds of everything close.

When we say the woods are quiet,
we mean a kind of spatial silence, nothing moving
faster than the red squirrel shimmying up a tree with a stolen peach.

Slung up to their fires, campers speak softly, mix their sounds with the night. I came around the bend and saw Lee curled in a canvas chair, holding his arm, making noises in his throat
like a bird.

Al Capone was Wisconsin's kind of criminal – made a mint bringing liquor to the drink-starved, gave money to charity, to boot.
His hideaway wasn't far from those woods where we drove fast, away from our campsite,
Lee shrinking into the seat, strapped to keep from jostling.

His sister the whistleblower whispered he'd been rollerblading backwards, down a hill, on a curve, when he flipped. He insisted his buckle opened on its own – even after I threatened to sue the company. True to his lies.

The nurse held his arm down hard and Lee screamed but the x-ray was silent. The doctor told him when it heals, it will be the strongest bone in his body. That night he slept without moving.

After a few days we went to the Flambeau River.
Lee's dad told him he'd always wanted to see that river, since he was a kid and heard stories of Al Capone, his hideaway, and now here they were.

They took off their shoes and stepped in.
Lee put his unbroken arm around his dad, who wrapped an arm around Lee. We have a picture of that, too, Lee's shoulders slender and limber. We called him Lemur.
There were lots of nicknames, each one a little truth.

[3]

Art Information

- "By the Campfire [3]" @ Drew Bryden

Karen Schubert: Poem

Published on Talking Writing (<https://talkingwriting.com>)

Karen Schubert is the recipient of a 2012 Ohio Arts Council Individual Excellence Award and a 2013 residency at Headlands Center for the Arts. Her third chapbook I Left My Wings on a Chair (Kent State Press 2014) is a Wick Poetry Center selection.

Her work appears or is forthcoming in terrain.org, Best American Poetry blog, MiPOesias, Quickly, and Ohio Poetry Anthology.

Source URL: <https://talkingwriting.com/karen-schubert-poem>

Links:

- [1] <https://talkingwriting.com/karen-schubert-poem>
- [2] <https://talkingwriting.com/talkingwriting-categories/featured-poetry>
- [3] <http://www.flickr.com/photos/80949849@N00/105521304>