

[Sheila Black: Two Poems \[1\]](#)

November 13, 2013 Featured Poetry [2]

& how you make me more alive

In the high plains, the bright colors of buildings in snow

I see only a picture on a screen myself turning away

(this long and studied) fading of even the idea

You (us)

For so long I wanted you It was not (pretty) though I willed it so it was (not) but every time you walked in a room

a small foretaste like two children on a boat

shining (and) stillness the voices hushed for night like the house where the father walks around turning (out) the lights or the tiny frogs croaking in the mud basins what pulsing of throat what (open)

I practice imagining you in places I can't see from (tiny) pictures reconstruct elaborate daily routines

what stones you count, two ravens on a wire fence or six swans aligned on a nickel-colored lake even a sourness of local bread (do they eat bread?)

local rice, the cold in the bowl the thin pancake. It doesn't matter (any) more

Sheila Black: Two Poems

Published on Talking Writing (<https://talkingwriting.com>)

he plays more beautifully when she is gone

The orphic (the Orpheus) lute player in an after of river and willow heedless and lost (where) his fingers find the edge in the string

I read this in the "Dictionary of Myths," a book

I love for its quixotic title. The muffle (echo) voice through the trees (which is this) in which I keep pruning (back), cutting lines like threads of wire as though (without) them I would (sing) better or (fly)

[3]

Letter in October

The man holds himself still in the glaze of wisteria, that purple bruise cool to enter me. Now he walks across

Sheila Black: Two Poems

Published on Talking Writing (<https://talkingwriting.com>)

a sunlit plaza, the doves above, the familiar background—drill, paint thinner, a stillness in his bones and mine—October: The trees preparing to flame and fall, become the bareness under us. I walk to my classroom down a hall hushed with dust, blown up from the south, the pure desert where the light might pin him, leave him without so much as a shadow.
And today I am all cage, the bones holding barely, the lava inside corrosive, a terrible bloom. Want me, the hum my pulse spins when I know it means so little—shiny thread, bright button.
Doves gather on the branches outside, plum petals shiver to ground, the burn inside the tree, the chill it senses under the flutter of sunlight, blue and more blue, the sky like an intercession.

Art Information

- "Japanese Wisteria [3]" © TANAKA Juuyoh; Creative Commons license.

Sheila Black is the author of House of Bone and Love/Iraq (both published by CW Press). She coedited (with Jennifer Bartlett and Mike Northen) Beauty Is a Verb: The New Poetry of Disability (Cinco Puntos Press), named a Notable Book for 2012 by the American Library Association. A third collection, Wen Kroy, is forthcoming from Dream Horse Press.

Black is a 2012 Witter Bynner Fellow in Poetry, selected by Philip Levine. She lives in San Antonio, Texas, where she directs Gemini Ink, a literary arts center.

Source URL: <https://talkingwriting.com/sheila-black-two-poems>

Links:

- [1] <https://talkingwriting.com/sheila-black-two-poems>
- [2] <https://talkingwriting.com/talkingwriting-categories/featured-poetry>
- [3] http://www.flickr.com/photos/tanaka_juuyoh/6401875597/

Sheila Black: Two Poems

Published on Talking Writing (<https://talkingwriting.com>)
