Poem by Robin Chapman

"A Local Life"

says the Washington Post in the obituary my sister sends—John Hoke, dead at 85, a tinkerer and inventor we never heard of, who spent his life seeing solutions everywhere: solar-powered boats and cars, roof gardens to cool in summer, heat in winter; yurt technology only now installed. He stocked the parks with electric golf carts, turned the dank stink of sludge ponds into sweet marsh ecosystems, wanted to bequeath twenty squirrels to every house, running wheels to generate what we need of electricity. On the clipping I try to calculate how many chipmunks that would convert to, in the spirit of using our local resource, though the insistent noise of vocal warning chirps might interfere with bedtime reading and morning oatmeal. Over my coffee I read that John Hoke's dead, and outside our problems multiply. "Opportunities," he'd have said.
